2013 PP

The youth-centered versions of dystopia part company with their adult one in some important aspects. For one thing, the grownup ones are grimmer. The British academia Kay argues that the “protagonist’s final defeat and failure is crucial to the admonitory nature of the classic adult dystopia.”

The adult dystopia extrapolates from the present to show readers how terrible things will become if our deplorable behavior continues unchecked. Because authors of children’s fiction are reluctant to depict the extinction of hope within their stories. Kay writes, they equivocate when it comes to delivering a moral.

Yes, our errors and delusions may lead to a catastrophe, but if – as usually happens in dystopian novels for children – a new, better way of life can be assembled from the ruins, would the apocalypse really be such a bad thing?

How is the young-dystopia fiction different from adult- dystopia fiction? Find two differences mentioned in the text?
